Nov. 1993 - present	:	Director of Science and Technology Development Program, Thailand Development Research Institute (TDRJ)

Major Responsibilities (at NSTDA) :

- Developing overall program plans and annual implementation plans to attain organisational objectives and formulating quarterly plans to meet the targets specified in the annual plans.
- Designing and implementing a program monitoring and evaluation system to appraise performance and impact of various programs, and projects or services within those programs, and to keep the management consistently and thoroughly informed about the progress and all other important elements of the operations.
- Initiating new programs to facilitate increased technological dynamism in the production sector, especially those concerning international technology transfer and acquisition with an aim to assist industrial firms make good decisions regarding technology purchase and obtain control and in-depth know-how of the purchased technology.
- Implementing an industrial consultancy service aiming at providing local and foreign short-term advisory services, covering a range of consulting disciplines such as engineering and business management, to help industrial firms diagnose their technical and managerial problems and design projects and activities to solve those problems.
- Designing and organising technology management workshops and other related professional seminars where key decision-makers from various public and private-sector organisations are brought together to interact with international and national experts to discuss important technology development issues and new development opportunities.
- Arranging for organised visits and study tours to local and overseas institutions and enterprises to promote the organisation, to acquire more understanding on various technology development issues and to facilitate local firms in their exploration of new technology-related business opportunities and relations.

 Through the passage of the Science and Technology Development Act (1991), STDB was transformed into the "National Science and Technology Development Agency (NSTDA)", a major public institute to stimulate and support public and private-sector science and technology development.

- Assisting in drafting and proposing the Science and Technology Development Act to transform the organisation to become a major driving force for rapid technology development by broadening its responsibility and authority to cover a wide range of activities in support of national economic development and particularly industrial development.
- Conducting and arranging for policy review and research on important development issues with an aim to bring about changes in legislation, policy practice and measures towards a policy regime that would be more supportive to stimulating technological dynamism in the production sector.
- Developing a five-year strategic plan, covering a budget of approximately ten billion Baht, to launch a wide spectrum of programs which are crucial to the attainment of the organisational objectives and the acceleration of technological capability development in the country.
- Assisting the Director in various management activities leading to the more effective functioning of the organisation, e.g. preparing job descriptions and staff hiring plans, negotiating with foreign organisations that are potential financial supporters or strategic alliances in technology businesses, and periodically making recommendations for increasing productivity and improving quality of the ongoing operations, etc.
